Abstract

The efficiency of the internal market protection through custom - tariffs measures is directly linked to the efficiency of the custom authority, the actual legislation and the governmental decisions and mostly by the professional competence and qualifications of the customs employees and managing directors. At the same time it is worth mentioning that the custom regulation can efficiently carry out its functions only when accompanied by other non - tariff regulation instruments and in the presence of some conditions that ensure high economic efficiency of the tariff methods. By that we indicate, firstly a stabile exchange rate, a proper correlation between internal and world prices, the balance between demand and offer on the internal market, a usual level of competition on the internal market and the absence of monopolist suppliers of goods and services. The absence of these conditions (sometimes the absence of one conditions is enough) reduces very fast the efficiency of the economic regulators and first of all of the custom taxes and fees.
